Changing the Culture of Academic Medicine

Linda Pololi, a hematologist/oncologist, has spent her medical career in academics. She argues that academic medicine falls short in its stated mission and responsibilities of medical education, patient care, and research, and she attempts to explore the reasons for these shortcomings through the experiences of women academic faculty. The author feels that participation of diverse voices, including women, men, and minorities, will create a more transparent and less hierarchical organization in academic medicine.
